

L.A. Cab driver here, and most of you fuckers don't know shit about Los Angeles.. Jeez wtf.. Old Mexican ladies speaking in code? No they're speaking Spanish.

Anyway, I hardly have any time to come on here and tell my tales, but there was this male nurse I was picking up for about three days (I gave him my business card and he became a steady client thereafter) I'd pick him up from a mental hospital in Norwalk and take him to different addresses. He always claimed that they were friend's houses and that they would take him home the rest of the way (it's not uncommon for people to split their trips like that in order to save money.)

Anyway, I thought he was awesome because he would always pay for the trips in advance over the phone (which you can do with a credit card through dispatch) and then one day he calls me to pick him up only when I get there the cops flag me down to tell me that my "nurse" was actually a patient that had somehow gotten into some of the lockers belonging to the staff that worked there at the psych hospital. He stole some uniforms and copied credit card numbers (which he was using to pay for his trips.)

They say he wasn't dangerous but that he was off his "meds."

The shit I can't figure out is where I was taking him and how he was getting back. Why didn't he use me to get back to the hospital? What was he doing? I discreetly took a picture of him with my phone the first night I picked him up. It's something I always do when someone pays with a credit card over the phone in case it's stolen. This is the picture btw.

[Image too large. Search CabbiesStory.]